For the last few years, my website has been trying to keep up with my trail. A project added here, a page dropped there, while new ideas kept arriving faster than I could give them a home.

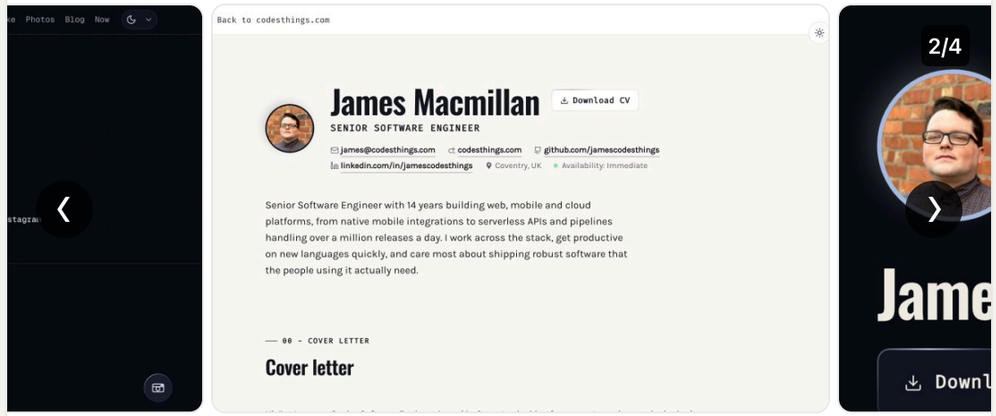

This week I let it catch its breath.

Now one slow arc of light crosses the page every sixteen seconds, and each arc is a day. The elements catch it as it passes. The avatar rises and sets like a small sun. When night comes, the page fades like dusk, from warm paper and ink to moonlit blue and silver. All of it is anchored by the sundial that started the idea.

At that pace, fourteen years go by in a single day.

That is about how it feels when I look back at everything I've built. Years of work, and I can watch all of it pass before dinner.

Come and watch a few days go by with me: codesthings.com
